Vol. 70, No. 2
April/May 2010

Published by the American Craft Council
www.craftcouncil.org

Departments

006
Letters
In the Mail

008
Editors’ Letter
Thinking about Tools

010
Zoom
Ceramics by Meredith Knapp Brickell, otherworldly glass by Andy Paiko, contemporary jewelry at the Luke & Eloy Gallery and the Ox-Bow school’s 100th anniversary are among the offerings.

026
Material Culture
Japanese lacquer master Yamamura Shinya goes miniature with exquisite boxes. Janet Koplos offers insight into Yamamura's inspiration and technique.

028
Outskirts
A new wave of toolmakers has been fine-tuning woodworking tools. Glenn Gordon highlights three companies known for producing tools that are craft objects in their own right.

030
Reviewed
Lilly Wei surveys the work of three leading glass artists from Venice at Barry Friedman Ltd. in New York; Glen R. Brown gains "perspective" on leading quilt makers at the International Quilt Study Center & Museum in Lincoln, NE; Christine Temin finds "attitude" in Sue Agyar-Kowalski’s tool-inspired objects at Mobilia Gallery in Cambridge, MA; and Craig Nutt critiques Brian Ferrell’s cantilevered furniture at the Appalachian Center for Craft in Smithville, TN.

036
Considering...
Glenn Adamson gives credit to the humble pencil as a supremely useful tool for jump-starting the creative process.

058
Hunting & Gathering
Michele Pred trolls airports and dumpsters for the industrial products that make up her conceptual pieces. Mija Riedel explores how the artist creates new, provocative frames of reference for these discards.

066
The Wide World of Craft
Fraser Conlon takes the pulse of craft in one of the most multicultural cities on the planet—Cape Town, South Africa.

072
From the Stacks
In the December 1983/January 1984 American Craft, Joy Cattanach Smith traced Judy Kensley McKie’s progression from self-taught woodworker to acclaimed furniture designer and maker. Christine Kaminsky brings us up-to-date on McKie’s distinguished career.

Right:
Cristiano Bianchin
Urna (Urns), 2007, hand-blown, ground and polished glass, crocheted synthetic thread, steel, 18 x 8 in.

Page 030
Good Hope for Craft: Cape Town, South Africa

“Art in South Africa seems very personal. There are so many cultural stories and nuances that need to be expressed before they go missing in the imminent mix of culture and race.” — Nic Braden

STORY BY
Fraser H. Conlon
To visit Cape Town is to be transported to a world of great natural beauty and a complex history. Situated on the southern tip of the African continent on the shore of Table Bay, Cape Town is the second-most populous city in South Africa, the largest in land area, and one of the most multiracial and multicultural places on earth. The Cape region’s indigenous peoples were joined by Europeans as long ago as 1652, when the Dutch established a settlement there, which soon drew other immigrants from Europe and (some involuntarily) from other parts of Africa and Asia, and the hub of a colony was born. The cultural diversity of Cape Town is reflected in the craft and art that can be found there, some of it unique to this part of the world.

The natural amphitheater-shaped area below Table Mountain, known as the City Bowl, has extraordinary galleries, craft markets and museums that embrace Cape Town’s eclectic heritage. The Iziko South African National Gallery houses a splendid collection of South African, African, British, French, Dutch and Flemish art providing insight into the range of aesthetic production in the country over the centuries. Of particular importance is the museum’s collection of South African beadwork. This craft is culturally significant since it was traditionally a form of creative expression for women predominantly from the Xhosa and Zulu tribes. Today it has blossomed into a varied and fascinating craft form.

Barbara Jackson and Shirley Fintz have found another way to embrace South Africa’s eclectic heritage. In 2000 the two artists founded the cultural empowerment project Monkeybiz, with the goal to alleviate poverty in the Cape townships (areas that had grown up under apartheid) and transfer skills to uneducated and unemployed women. The women create magical sculptural animals inspired by the wildlife of southern Africa—brightly patterned elephants, antelopes and rhinoceroses that elicit smiles at the playful ingenuity of the... work. “Monkeybiz has improved the quality of life for these women,” says Joan Krupp, who manages the Monkeybiz retail store. “They have food on their tables and are able to send their children to school.” The project has been enormously successful, with a global reach and distribution supporting over 450 women living in the impoverished townships of the region. “The art of beadwork had died due to apartheid,” says Krupp. “Monkeybiz revived this form in a contemporary, quirky medium.” In addition to keeping alive the ancient traditions of beading, Monkeybiz also has an active AIDS and HIV Awareness program designed to educate and assist with medical care and preventative measures, along with providing the artists with access to necessary medications.

Nestled on the quirky lanes of the Cape Quarter is Streetwires, another successful venture that has used cultural skills of wirework and beading to produce limited-edition sculptures. Sculptures of Nguni, a favored breed of African cattle, are highly sought after and represent some of the most successful pieces from this studio. “These pieces are extremely special, as they were the first high-end, larger-scale, realistic fully beaded rendition of an animal revered in South African culture,” says Cathy Rona-san, Streetwires’ export manager. “They changed bead and wire craft into art.”

A visit to the Cape Quarter would not be complete without spending time in Africa Nova, a lovely gallery housing an eclectic collection of fine jewelry, artworks, ceramics, textiles and crafts, all effectively curated within the split-level space.

Woodstock, the oldest suburb in the City Bowl, was recently designated one of the city’s improvement projects, and as a result is an emerging and creative hub with several new prestigious galleries, a host of cafés and restaurants and an extremely popular Saturday farmers market. The most notable galleries to visit are Michael Stevenson, considered the leading contemporary art gallery in the country, and, next door, Linda Goodman Gallery, another venerable space representing established South African artists such as William Kentridge, David Goldblatt and Sam Nlengethwa. To discover a new generation, one should look into Whatiftheworld Gallery, selected by Contemporary Magazine (London) as one of the “Top 50 Emerging Galleries from Around the World” in 2007. “We are committed to nurturing our artists and working closely with them on a curatorial level,” says director Justin Rhodes, on why the gallery has been a success. “Even though we work with younger artists, we place a strong focus on presenting the works with a very high production level.”

In among the fine arts venues of Woodstock is a vibrant and active craft community. The ceramics studio of Andile Dyalvane, a rising young talent, is located in one of the neighborhood’s most exciting commercial spaces, the Old Biscuit Mill. Dyalvane’s work, a skillful mingling of ancient Right:
Katherine Glenday
Africa Burn, 2009,
porcelain, dimensions
variable.

Bottom:
Katherine Glenday
Cape Point Vessel, 2009, porcelain, 15% x 11% in;
Vessel, 2009, 4% x 4% in.

Fascinated by light and inspired by the splendid landscape..., Katherine Glenday captures moments that resonate, glow and calm.

traditional codes and modern expressions, has been acknowledged through various national awards. Born into a pastoral Xhosa family, he has actively challenged himself to bridge his different worlds—the rural, traditional value system that is an important part of his heritage, and the urban city life he experiences on a daily basis. The results, soulful and expressive, are beautifully proportioned ceramic vessels, often marked with a razor blade or found tools, tattooed symbols of primordial culture and tribal scarification.

To fully experience the inspired craft of the Cape, a drive should be planned to the fishing village Kalk Bay, about an hour’s drive from the city center, where a remarkable group of South Africa’s ceramic artists reside. Katherine Glenday, an influential artist, began as a painter but then decided on porcelain as her medium. For 23 years she has devoted herself to the vessel as a form of sublime and articulate communication.
by the splendid landscape surrounding her studio and The Forge, a space for music recitals, exhibitions and happenings, she captures moments that resonate, glow and calm.

Neighbors of Glenday are the brothers Chris (with whom she’s worked in the past) and Nic Bladen, both silversmiths and metal workers. Chris focuses on larger sculptures of fish soaring into the air, dancing above the waves, while Nic’s intricate and delicate pieces are fashioned from the indigenous plant life of the Cape, home to some 20 percent of Africa’s flora. Nic casts the entire plant, including the root system, in delicate sculptures of various precious metals. “To me, art in South Africa seems very personal,” says Nic. “There are so many cultural stories and nuances that need to be expressed before they go missing in the imminent mix of culture and race.”

Another Kalk Bay local who contributes to the ceramics world is Christina Bryer. Her captivating porcelain mandalas offer the viewer a space for reprieve—a moment in which to rest within the perfect geometry from the noise of the world.

It should be no surprise that Cape Town is home to extraordinary art, craft, design and architecture. Varied and original, these manifestations are part of the fabric that makes South Africa and its peoples unique. With the blight of apartheid (the government policy of racial separation that was in force for 40 years) now 16 years in the past, this society is forging new creative territory, inspired by rich traditions, a spectacular physical environment and a desire to have the nation succeed through the sharing of ideas and skills, recognition of differences, and respect for ethnicity and ancient arts. “Craft in Cape Town is vibrant, colorful, chaotic and inspiring,” says Cathy Ronason. “It is beautiful in its rawness and has a soul that projects the energy of the country we live in.”

Fraser H. Conlon is a partner in Amaridian, a Manhattan-based gallery specialising in contemporary art from Sub-Saharan Africa.

Above:
Chris Bladen
Yellowfin Duo, 2004, edition of 15, bronze, wood and granite base, 14 x 9 7/8 x 15 in.

Below:
Nic Bladen

Right:
Nic Bladen
New collection, 2009, bronze, silver, tallest 28 7/8 in.